Fund manager commentary

Equity markets continued their relentless ascent in October supported by robust macro data and strong corporate earnings. Bond markets were becalmed as investors awaited the appointment of the Chair of the Federal Reserve, whilst comments from Mario Draghi soothed fears over an abrupt removal of monetary stimulus in Europe. In the UK both economic and inflation data was slightly stronger than forecast by markets, making a rate rise in November a near certainty. Currency markets provided the only hint of volatility as investors responded to the divergent interest rate paths of the major economies, pushing the Euro and the Yen lower. The single currency had rallied this year on a resurgent European economy, but the ECB's dovish stance stands in contrast to the steady path of rate rises set by the Federal Reserve. Meanwhile Japan's ongoing QE programme made the Yen vulnerable to weakness, despite its undervaluation. Within equity markets, investors put aside any concerns over valuations and rewarded companies whose earnings beat expectations. Some of the largest US technology companies share prices soared, helping Amazon founder Jeff Bezos to become the world's richest person. Despite this apparent headwind, our value factor ETFs kept pace with markets, helped by the fact that they have the same sector weightings as the benchmark. This helps to avoid crowding into sectors that turn out to be value traps and helping them to keep up when the market is driven by a limited number of sectors. Within fixed income markets, bond yields barely moved over the month as investors assessed the contenders for the Chair of the Federal Reserve, how dovish or hawkish their views are, and the probability that they would be chosen by President Trump. Finally, we further increased our allocation to diversifying assets. In a world where returns are increasingly driven by equity allocations and where developed government bond yields remain depressed, we think it is important to have other sources of return and diversification within the portfolio.
