Fund manager commentary

October was characterised by a moderation in the sharp rise in global bond yields as tightening financial conditions, weaker risk sentiment and periodic safe-haven demand for duration offset the impact of persistent inflation and elevated energy prices. While inflation remained above target across most developed economies, investors increasingly focused on whether higher market rates were beginning to deliver the economic slowing central banks had been seeking.

Fiscal sustainability remained a key market theme. France continued to attract significant investor scrutiny amid ongoing budget uncertainty and concerns around the credibility of future fiscal consolidation, contributing to elevated volatility in European sovereign bond markets as Italian and Spanish bonds reversed some of the contagion. More broadly, investors became increasingly selective across government bond markets, demanding greater compensation from issuers facing deteriorating fiscal dynamics and reinforcing concerns around higher term premia globally.

In the United States, the Federal Reserve left policy unchanged in October but maintained a bias towards further tightening should inflation remain persistent. Market participants increasingly debated whether policy rates were near their peak, with stronger demand for Treasuries emerging during periods of equity market weakness. Across the rest of the G10, central banks generally retained hawkish rhetoric, although markets increasingly viewed most tightening cycles as being in their final stages. The ECB continued to balance inflation risks against slowing growth and political uncertainty, while the Bank of Japan maintained its gradual normalisation process.
